A sale today. Cash later.

A small creative studio		Fictional case
Work sold this month		$8,000
Cash received		$2,000
Costs due this month		$5,000

A sale and its payment can happen at different times. Profit describes revenue minus expenses for a period. Cash depends on the money you start with, the money you receive, and the payments you make.

Save & exit

What would you check first?

Before recommending a fix for the studio, choose what you need to know.

☒ Opening cash and payment dates

☐ How much more work it can sell

☐ Whether revenue grew last month

Why that one?

The invoices don't tell me what's in the bank. I need the starting balance and when the bills are due.

You found the missing information.

You separated the sale from the payment.

The $3,000 gap in this month’s cash movements is useful. The opening balance tells you whether it becomes a payment problem.

Independent attempt

One useful next step

Ask when the outstanding $6,000 will arrive, then compare it with the bills’ due dates.

Same idea. Different business.

A CATERER · FICTIONAL CASE

A client pays a $4,000 deposit today for an event next month. Ingredients will cost $2,500.

Does cash in the bank mean it is all profit?

No. The caterer still has to deliver the event and cover its costs. I'd check the remaining expenses before calling it profit.

Save my practice →

Your later review will check this in a new context.
